Francis G. Couvares is the E. Dwight Salmon Professor of History and American Studies at Amherst College. He is the author of The Remaking of Pittsburgh: Class and Culture in an Industrializing City 1877-1919 (1984) and editor of Movie Censorship and American Culture, Second Edition (2006).

Martha Saxton is an Associate Professor of History and Women's and Gender Studies and the Elizabeth Bruss Reader at Amherst College. She has written biographies of Louisa May Alcott and Jayne Mansfield, as well as Being Good: Women's Moral Values In Early America (2003), and numerous essays on women in early America.

Founding editors of Interpretations of American History Gerald N. Grob and George Athan Billias are Sigerist Professor of the History of Medicine Emeritus at Rutgers University and Hyatt Professor of History Emeritus at Clark University, respectively.

The book was in horrible condition. Highlight marks everywhere, notes, and more. I felt that for 150 dollars it would at least be in an acceptable condition. It's nicely written, but do be careful about who you buy it from.

Awesome

It is absolutely never easy to write a coherent work of historiography, and they are never much fun to read. Nevertheless, they can serve a certain crucial purpose within the field. One does not doubt that the authors have sincerely attempted to write an edifying work, but it is hard to characterize the text as anything other than cumbersome and frequently very confused. Some chapters are basically coherent chronological progressions through the relevant debate. Others, however, jump wildly from theme to theme in a way that thoroughly disorients the reader. The better part of one's time in any given chapter is dedicated to deciphering the development of history in that field. In most chapters, the period after the 1960s fragmentation of most fields results in a sudden profusion of works, and actual discussion of the works is reduced to almost meaningless blurbs. The authors would have done much better to have made more general statements with fewer authors and kept better sight of the larger vacillations in the field. A critical editorial note should mention the frequent typos in titles and multiple dates given for a single work in different chapters (the date given should ALWAYS reference the ORIGINAL publication date everywhere in a work of historiography). Finally, a number of the author bios for the excerpts have not been updated. As a Europeanist I cannot say if better works exist on the subject, but my discussions with my Americanist colleagues all suggest that this work only barely fills the gap and needs serious revision to serve as a truly adequate text.
